What was more important, however, was the method he used to question their knowledge.

A friend of Socrates asked the priestess of Apollo at Delphi who the wisest man in the world was. ( ① ) The oracular reply was that there was no one wiser than Socrates. ( ② ) When Socrates heard about this, he was astounded, and went to the most knowledgeable people he could find to try to disprove it. ( ③ ) What he discovered was that these people only thought they knew a great deal; under examination, their knowledge was proved to be either limited or false. ( ④ ) He took the standpoint of someone who knew nothing, and merely asked questions, exposing contradictions in arguments and gaps in knowledge to gradually elicit insights. ( ⑤ ) He likened the process to his mother's profession of midwife, assisting in the birth of ideas.
