One important characteristic of a post-industrial society is an increase in the importance of theoretical knowledge. Industrial societies are interested in the practical side of things.

- (A) Nevertheless, medical personnel retain this information in a computer; they do not need to find a short-run value for it. Possibly, in the future, researchers will have collected sufficient data from which to propose a theory regarding the causes of and cures for a given disease.
- (B) For example, in hospitals today, a great deal of research is being conducted. Medical institutions are collecting all sorts of data on their patients. In many cases, though the data are analyzed, no answer is found.
- (C) They concentrate on what works and ignore the rest. A post-industrial society, however, is concerned with more than just this short-run, heavily pragmatic view.
